

FELT · FIBRE

Teaching With Deeper Mindfulness

A Guide for Facilitators — What It Is, How It Works, and How to Get Started

Making the practices land and last for life.

Welcome

Teaching is different when the person in front of you — or on the other end of a video call — isn't just receiving information. They're changing, in their body, over weeks, and you get to watch it happen. That's what this is for.

This guide is for you if you're thinking about teaching a course through Deeper Mindfulness — Finding Mindfulness first, with more courses coming after it. I want to walk you through what you'd actually be doing, week to week, and what's different here from teaching the same material somewhere else.

I built this platform because I wanted teaching to feel less like broadcasting information and more like actually being with people while they change. Everything in this guide exists because of that one idea.

What's Actually Different Here

Most course platforms give you a video call, maybe a slide deck, and hope you remember everything. This one gives you three things most platforms don't.

Full access to everything behind the course

Not just the session script, but the reasoning behind it. Why each session sits where it does. What it's built to change in someone's nervous system, and why.

A live thinking partner while you teach

Something you can ask a question mid-session, without breaking the flow of the class to go look something up. This is the part I'm most excited about — more on it below.

Real students, tracked properly

You can see exactly where each person is in the course, not guess. No spreadsheet, no separate system.

How It Starts

I do the admin side — creating the course, setting up the specific run of it (we call this an “instance” — think of it as one particular intake, with its own start date and its own group of people), and assigning you as the facilitator.

Once that's done, you'll see it the moment you log in. A new toggle appears in your sidebar — Clients and Courses, sitting side by side. Clients is your existing 1-1 work, if you do any. Courses is new — tap it, and you'll see every course you're assigned to teach.

You can be assigned to more than one course, and more than one facilitator can be assigned to the same course — if two of you are running a cohort together, you'll both see it, both have full access, and both can add your own notes.

Your Course Workspace

Tap into a course and you'll land in four tabs. I'll walk through each one properly — not just what it is, but what to actually do with it.

One course, one place — nothing to juggle between tabs, spreadsheets, or a separate messaging app.

From Per's admin screen to your workspace, in two steps

Roster

Every person enrolled, in one list. You'll see their name, their email, and — this is the part I like — their real progress. Not “did they log in,” but how many sessions they've actually completed, shown as a percentage. If someone's fallen behind, you'll see it here before it becomes a problem, not after. Each person on the roster has two buttons next to their name:

Message, and Notes. Tap Message and you're taken straight into a conversation with them, the same screen you'd use for any 1-1 client. Tap Notes and you can write something private about how they're doing — it goes straight into the Notes tab below, and nobody but you (and any co-facilitator on this same course) will ever see it.

Sessions

This is where you prepare, and it's worth knowing exactly how it works. Every session in the course gets its own card here — a title, a date field you can set for when you're actually running it, and two text boxes underneath. Want to add a new one? There's a plain “+ Add session” button at the bottom of the list — tap it, a new card appears, and you fill it in. The first box is the handout — anything you write here, your students can see. Use it for what you'd hand someone on paper if you were in a room together: a summary, a question to sit with, a line from the poem. The second box is your own notes. Nobody else ever sees this. Write whatever actually helps you — what went well last time you ran this session, a reminder about someone specific, a thought about pacing. Change anything, then press Save on that card — nothing saves automatically, so if you've written something you want to keep, make sure you've pressed it. This is also, and this matters, what feeds the live teaching companion I'll get to in a moment.

Content

The course itself, laid out exactly as your students see it — session by session, in order. Nothing to edit here, just a clean reference so you always know exactly what they're looking at, without needing to log in as a student to check.

Notes

Every note you've written about anyone in this course, gathered in one feed, most recent first. If two facilitators are running the same course together, you'll each see whose note is whose — useful if you're handing off, or just want to know what your co-facilitator noticed that you might have missed.

The Live Teaching Companion

Here's the part I actually built this whole thing to make possible.

Most of the time you're teaching alone. If someone asks a question you didn't expect — about the science behind a signal, about why the body does something a certain way — you either wing it, or you say “let me get back to you,” and the moment's gone.

This is a way around that. While you're teaching — most likely with this open on a second screen, your Zoom call in the other window — you have a live conversation partner sitting right there, one that knows the entire framework properly. Not a general chatbot. Something built specifically on the FELT·FIBRE science: every signal, the three big worries the nervous system carries, the Moro Reflex Brake, sleep consolidation, all of it.

How to use it, live

Open the course, and you'll see the conversation panel already sitting on the right, exactly the way it works for 1-1 client work already. Above it, a small dropdown: “Teaching right now.” Pick the session you're covering — this pulls in whatever private notes you wrote for that exact session, so the answers you get back are actually about what's happening in the room, not generic. Then just ask. Type, or use your voice — hold the microphone button the same way you would anywhere else in the app. Ask it to explain something. Ask why a practice works the way it does. If a participant catches you off guard with a real question, you can quietly check the answer without anyone knowing you needed to.

This is the part I think matters most: in your sidebar, there's a toggle — Plain, Clinical, Technical. Pick Plain and you get an answer in the kind of language you'd actually say out loud to a room — short, direct, no jargon. Pick Technical and you get the full mechanistic answer, the kind you'd want if you were writing a paper or explaining it to another clinician. Clinical sits in between.

Nothing about the underlying science changes between the three — just how it's said. Switch anytime, mid-conversation, depending on who's asking and what they need.

Same Question, Your Choice of Answer

One toggle in your sidebar. Same real science underneath — only the language changes, and you can switch mid-conversation.

Same question. The register changes; the science underneath doesn't.

A practical note: switching which session you're “teaching right now”, or switching between Clients and Courses mode, opens a fresh conversation — you'll see the chat clear. That's deliberate. It means you're never accidentally reading answers built around last week's session while you're standing in front of this week's class.

Talking With Your Students

Every student enrolled in a course you teach can message you directly, the same way an existing 1-1 client already can. It works both ways — you can start the conversation from their row in your Roster, or they can reach out first.

If you're already someone's individual coach outside of this course too, that's a separate thing entirely — this doesn't merge the two. A student can have a real relationship with you through a course, through 1-1 work, or both, and everything stays where it should.

Full Access, Genuinely

You're not locked to just the sessions you're teaching. Everything in the library — every course, every piece of background material, every document explaining why something is built the way it is — is open to you as a facilitator. If you're curious how a different course handles something, or want to borrow an idea from another course while you're teaching this one, it's all there.

This Grows With Us

Finding Mindfulness is the first course built this way, but the whole system underneath it — the roster, the sessions, the live companion, everything in this guide — isn't specific to this one course. The moment we bring on a second course, it works exactly the same way, because none of it was built just for this one.

If you're teaching well and want to take on a second course later, or help train someone else to teach one, the groundwork's already there.

Common Questions

A few things people ask me before they start.

Do I need to be technical?

No. If you can use a phone or a laptop for email, you can use everything in this guide. Nothing here needs installing, configuring, or troubleshooting on your end.

What if I'm co-teaching with someone?

You'll both see the same course, the same roster, the same sessions. Your own notes stay clearly labelled with your name, so nothing gets mixed up between you.

What if a student messages me about something outside the course?

That's fine — the same conversation screen handles anything they want to bring to you. If you're also their 1-1 coach separately, that relationship stays entirely its own thing; this doesn't merge them.

Can I see how a session went after I've taught it?

Yes — your own notes on that session stay exactly where you left them, in the Sessions tab, ready for next time you teach it.

What happens if I'm assigned to more than one course?

Nothing changes about how any of this works — you'll just see more than one course listed when you tap into Courses, and each one has its own roster, sessions, and companion, entirely separate from the others.

Getting Started, In Practice

If you're reading this because you're thinking about teaching with us, here's honestly what happens next.

We talk, and if it's a good fit, I set you up as a facilitator in the system — you'll get your own login. I assign you to a course instance. From there, you're in — the Courses tab appears, the workspace is ready, and this guide — and Tomte, if you have a question I haven't answered here — is with you the whole way through.

You don't need to be a programmer or particularly technical to use any of this. Everything above is genuinely just tapping around a few tabs and typing or talking normally. If something's unclear once you're in there, ask Tomte — this exact guide is what it's reading from.

Closing

I built this because teaching shouldn't mean carrying everything in your head alone, and it shouldn't mean students feeling like a number on a spreadsheet either. This is meant to hold some of that weight so you can just be present with the people in front of you.

Welcome, if you're joining us. I'm glad you're here.

— Per

© Per Norrgren · Deeper Mindfulness · www.deepermindfulness.org · Not for reproduction without written permission.